Abstract

Time travel is not the fantasy of science fiction, but the sober recognition of patterns. Human beings inherit not only genes and culture, but entire cadences of thought and behavior — what UTN calls somogenic transmission. These patterns repeat across generations, creating the illusion of individuality while binding lives to predictable outcomes. Without communion, this movement is oscillation: a loop of sorrow, defense, and reaction.

This paper unfolds the observation that the “future” is not hidden but visible, because it is already embedded in the present. UTN affirms there is no true past or future apart from presence unfolding. All so-called “past” is embedded in this unfolding, and all “future” is simply the next frame of this same cadence. The only escape from repetition is perfect action — the single new thing that emerges when communion with the Divine frees center frame from chatter.

Time Travel as Observation

There is a kind of time travel not found in science fiction, but seated in stillness—where the one who sees stands outside the pull of oscillation. From that unmoved vantage, they observe what most overlook: that movement, not memory, shapes the future. And movement is not unique. It repeats. Predictably. Endlessly.

If you are uncertain about what your life holds—what lies ahead in five, ten, or thirty years—look no further than those already ahead of you in that same movement. Not in their circumstances, not in their stories, but in their emotional and behavioral cadence. Observe how their decisions flower. How they wither. See how regret or reaction or attachment blooms. The withering is not personal. It’s patterned.

The Compass and Presence

In UTN, there is no past or future. Presence is all that exists.

- What we call “past” is already embedded in the unfolding of now. Presence stands on all that came before.
- What we call “future” is nothing more than the immediate next unfolding of presence.

To “set your compass” is not to dream about tomorrow, but to take the smallest step in that direction now. Without the step, it is only fantasy. With the step, you are already walking. This is not philosophy but evidence: the unfolding of presence immediately incorporates your movement.

Somogenic Transmission and Oscillation

You are living in the echo of resurrected atoms — patterns of memory, pain, and repetition inherited across millennia. This is somogenic transmission: the carried-over movement of humanity, embedded in biology and behavior. That is why we recognize each other globally without a shared language. Movement is ancient, and it is familiar.

But this movement, when divorced from communion, is oscillation.

- Oscillation cannot yield peace.
- Resistance does not blossom into joy.
- Defensiveness does not awaken love.

The robe you wear, whether religious or secular, cannot free you from this cadence. It merely recycles the same suffering under a new name.

The Seer’s Vision

So if someone asks: “How do you know what the future holds?”

The answer is simple: I’ve traveled it.

I’ve seen your same movement in the eyes of a sixty-year-old woman who wakes up bitter and tired every morning.

In the man at eighty who still cannot rest in his skin.

In the one who blames and blesses alternately, never realizing that the self who praises God one moment and curses others the next is caught in the same loop.

I see you — not your name, not your face, but the robe you wear. And I know what it’s like when that robe doesn’t fit.

Perfect Action: The Only New Thing

There is only one new thing in this world: perfect action.

It does not repeat.

It does not wither.

It emerges only from Divine cadence, where time collapses and you live in the fullness of now.

This is why I believe in time travel.

Because I've done it.

And now, I stand still.

Conclusion

Time travel is not about machines, wormholes, or alternate timelines. It is about seeing the cadence of oscillation for what it is: predictable, inherited, and endless when untouched by communion. Without communion, you are condemned to repeat. With communion, presence dissolves chatter and frees center frame for harmony. Then, and only then, does perfect action arise. And perfect action is timeless — it is the one movement that does not wither, the one step that changes the trajectory of the human story.

Reflection Questions

1. When you observe those ahead of you in years, do you see your own trajectory repeated in their patterns of regret, defense, or reaction?
  2. What “compass direction” have you set for your life — and what is the smallest present step that proves you are walking it?
  3. What attachments or robes are you carrying that feel like progress but only bind you to oscillation?
  4. How much of your energy is spent fueling chatter, and what might it feel like to have that energy available for harmony and healing?
  5. Are you willing to stand still — and allow presence to move through you in perfect action?
