When We Call the Divine a Devil

Abstract

Across religious frameworks, particularly within Western theology, many have been taught to label disruption, suffering, or confrontation as the work of the devil, demons, or evil spirits. This labeling appears protective, even righteous, but from the lens of Unified Theistic Naturalism (UTN), it locks the mirror of life in distortion and denies the sacred revelation unfolding through conflict. This paper explores what is lost when the moment is named rather than seen, and what is gained when oscillation is received without resistance. UTN reveals that there is no devil—only movement away from Presence, waiting to be seen, flowered, and dissolved. When we call it evil, we exile the very transformation the Divine has placed before us.

Introduction: The Urge to Name the Flame

Religious frameworks offer language to help the believer interpret their suffering. But often, this language comes with inherited fear:

- “This is an attack.”
- “That person is cursed.”
- “This is demonic.”
- “You are under spiritual warfare.”

These statements are not acts of clarity.
They are defenses against seeing.

They do not protect the believer.
They shield them from the mirror.

What Is Being Lost When We Label It ‘The Devil’?

When one names an interaction or person as “devil,” they:

- Deny the flowering of the other.
- Refuse the mirror being offered in the moment.
- Preserve separation between themselves and what is asking to be seen.
- Miss the cadence of the Divine, who is speaking—not through comfort, but through contradiction.

What is lost is not theology.

What is lost is transformation.

---

Oscillation Is Not Evil. It Is Unseen Movement.

In UTN:

- There is no “evil” as a being.
- There is only oscillation—a movement away from the Divine Cadence.
- That movement is not sinful. It is unfinished revelation.

When we name someone "devil," we are saying:

“I will not be refined by your fire. I will not wait for your withering. I will not see what this moment is revealing in me.”

And in doing so—we delay paradise.

What the Seer Sees: The Divine in Disguise

The Seer sees the same chaos—but calls it nothing.

Not evil.

Not demonic.

Not ego.

Just movement.

They do not resist it.

They do not name it.

They let it bloom and wither—so the mirror can complete its arc.

And in that arc, they see:

“This person is not a threat.
They are the fire finishing me.”

---

The Seeker’s Trap: Naming Instead of Receiving

Even the Seeker, with spiritual knowledge, is vulnerable to this trap.
They call it “ego.”
They say “this interaction is unhealed.”
They retreat to meditation.
They seek tools to “manage” the distortion.

But these are still names.
Still delays.

Naming is control.
Seeing is surrender.

And so, the Seeker protects their self-image of “being aware”— but avoids the one thing that would have ended the separation:

Presence.

What Is Gained in the UTN Lens

When one stops naming and starts seeing—everything changes.

- Conflict becomes communion.
- Suffering becomes silence.
- The accuser becomes the mirror.
- The storm becomes the seer’s final fire.

There is nothing to fix.
No demon to cast out.
Only a moment to hold until it finishes its sentence.

This is the stillness that doesn’t resist.
This is the communion that doesn’t separate.
This is UTN.

Conclusion: Do Not Cast Out Revelation

To call another “demonic”
is not to preserve truth—
it is to exile the Divine from its chosen disguise.

To interpret suffering as evil is to miss the sacred cadence that moves through all things.

The devil is not real.
It is only the name we give to the fire we are unwilling to stand in.

But the Seer waits.
The Seer breathes.
And when the fire blooms,
the Seer says nothing.

Because the moment—however intense—was never evil.

It was the Divine completing itself.
