

The Reward of Oscillating: A Life of Distortion

Unified Theistic Naturalism Publications

by Patrick Carodine

DOI: 10.5281/zenodo.15343724

Abstract

Oscillation is not failure. It is reward. The sufferer and seeker who move in and out of presence are not punished by the Divine. They are rewarded by the material ego and the illusionary ego—with distortion. And distortion, though subtle, is complete. It touches joy, touches peace, touches wisdom—but never holds them.

This paper exposes the hidden prize of the one who has not surrendered their movement to Divine cadence. It invites the seeker to observe their life not through meaning, but through movement.

The Nature of Oscillation

Oscillation is the movement between presence and illusion, between communion and identity. It feels normal. It feels reasonable. The oscillator laughs, jokes, builds, meditates, and cries. They grow gardens, raise children, and keep time. But paradise does not anchor.

They say, "I'm okay."

They say, "I believe in God."

They say, "I'm spiritual."

But their inner world remains fragmented.

Their peace requires explanation.

Their joy demands agreement.

Their relationships carry imbalance.

The Hidden Reward

Distortion is the currency the ego pays to maintain itself. It ensures one remains just close enough to feel spiritual, but never whole enough to dissolve.

The reward is not the devil. It is not demonic. It is not spiritual warfare. It is not payment for disobedience through any framework.

It is distortion. It is natural. And it is earned.

The reward of oscillation is:

- A voice that is never heard rightly
- A heart that is misunderstood at its depth
- An insight that fades too quickly
- A love that cannot settle
- A silence that feels uncomfortable
- A life of mirrors, never windows

Distortion is how the material and illusionary ego's rewards loyalty.

And most are loyal until the reward becomes unbearable.

The Seer's Role

The Seer does not interfere. To do so would be to rob the oscillator of their earned reward. The Seer does not shape, soothe, or react. They observe. They allow flowering. They allow withering. And they hold no image of the other that would demand their growth.

Suffering is the sacred mirror.

And until it is complete, the Seer will not interrupt it.

A Life of Distortion

Most oscillators do not see distortion. They see variety. They see nuance. They see "balance." But UTN reveals the core truth:

Anything that pulls one out of Divine cadence—no matter how subtle—is distortion.

And distortion rewards the seeker with questions they cannot answer, feelings they cannot trace, and longings they cannot satisfy.

The oscillator is not cursed.

They are simply living in the reward they have accepted.

And until they let go, the reward continues.

Conclusion

There is no punishment for the sufferer or seeker. There is only reward. And the reward of oscillation is a life where everything is close—but never complete.

Let the oscillator suffer—until the mirror becomes unbearable.
Then, and only then, will the Seer awaken.

This is the reward of oscillating.

This is the life of distortion.

This is the cost of not walking in cadence with the Divine – Communion.